traceable to the primary-standard optical power measuring electrical-substitution cryogenic radiometers. The radiance responsivity scale was needed to calibrate new-generation optical-radiation thermometers to realize the detector-responsivity-based radiance temperature scale and the SI unit, the kelvin.

Accurate measurement of optical radiation is required when sources of optical radiation are used in biological research. Such measurement of broad-band noncoherent optical radiations usually must be performed by a highly trained specialist using sophisticated, complex, and expensive instruments.

All standards are measured according to ISO 2813 (1994) and ASTM D523 (1989) for gloss at 20°, 60° and 85°. The reference gloss meter used at NPL uses a tungsten source, with filter, to provide a close match to CIE Standard Illuminant C and a filtered silicon detector providing a good approximation to the photopic response function,  $V(\lambda)$ . A pre and post cleaning measurement are standard.
